When I say something like "The person that you are talking to has a lot of effort put into it." What is a more natural way to say this? The person that you are talking to has a lot of effort put into it. The person that you are talking to has a lot of effort put into him/her/it. The person that you are talking to has a lot of effort put into him. A: The first is the most natural, since it's the noun form of the adjective. The second is a contraction. The third sounds odd. The more abstract meaning of "effort" is the subject of the sentence. So the first is a better fit. It would sound more natural to say "The effort the person made was impressive". The sentence "The effort he made was impressive" would be the second choice. If you want to express "effort" as a noun, "The effort he put into it" is the best choice. "The effort put into it" is awkward. Nucleophosmin immunoreactivity in the developing rat cerebellum: immunohistochemical localization and effects of colchicine treatment. We examined the distribution of nucleophosmin in the developing rat cerebellum. At birth the nucleophosmin-immunoreactive staining is strong in the cytoplasm of all granule cells. At postnatal day 2 (P2) the staining is restricted to the granule cell nuclei and in the cytoplasm of neurons of the external granular layer (EGL). In both the EGL and the inner granular layer (IGL) the staining gradually

More than 90% of Filipinos get their daily news from television, and most viewers rely on what they see as important, trusted, "authoritative" (i.e., state-controlled) and foreign-owned sources for information. "Outlets like CNN, Fox, and BBC are regularly consumed for news and information," said Hannah Wiseman, from New America, which runs an independent monitoring network in the Philippines. The Philippines' Social Watch and New America's IDEAS reported that the frequency of citizens discussing the government's handling of the virus in social media increased during the early days of the national crisis (corresponding to the government's response to the outbreak). At the same time, both organizations observed that the government's messaging began to focus on the "nationalist" dimension of the crisis, including efforts to boost morale. "Healthcare and the economy were most frequently discussed in social media," said Wiseman. "Social media was a tool to facilitate information sharing, enable a community of care, and support the people of the Philippines and abroad in the global effort to contain the outbreak."
