I am also planning to use Silverlight in the app as it would be very easy to update the contents. I have a few questions: Is it a good idea to use Silverlight in the app, what are the advantages and disadvantages of it? I've heard of XBAP but not used it. How do I connect the ASP.NET MVC 3.0 app to the WCF Service. Should I use standard WebHttpBinding? What is the easiest way to update the contents in the Silverlight app, what do I need? A: Silverlight offers you a cross platform experience for any kind of application. But it doesn't support all features of the .NET Framework. For example you don't have async, event based programming, you don't have Dependency Properties and Data Binding and you don't have Dependency Services. But you have a good framework to develop your business logic and services in. There is also a framework for using MVC in the Silverlight context: It is not as easy as using normal WebForms, but it's the only framework I know. You will not have a lot of controls. As for the way to update the silverlight app.

You can use AJAX polling to update your view. You can also use simple `HttpRequest` to perform a call on your WCF Service. A: Silverlight has been created to give you the power of the web in a single application. It is cross-platform (windows, osx, linux, ipod, android). It can run on virtually any hardware. Is it a good idea to use Silverlight in the app, what are the advantages and disadvantages of it? Silverlight is one of the most elegant and powerful things that Microsoft has ever come up with in the application world. Advantage of silverlight: The ability to create a great user interface 2d92ce491b
