The last thing any cop wants to do is touch a suspect's phone. But don't be surprised if you see them do it. This is the point of the video above, in which a cop is attempting to determine whether a suspect had been stalking and harassing an ex-girlfriend. During a search of the phone, the cop discovers emails he's sent his girlfriend, but he can't find any evidence of inappropriate phone contact with her. This, however, seems to matter a lot more than the emails themselves: "I got in and out of the car as fast as I could," said one of the cops in the video. "He got mad as hell, all the way up until the point where I pulled away." Advertisement Now, this is the line that still confuses me: This isn't "evidence" of stalking — the emails were sent from the victim's phone. It's not like there were GPS coordinates, or notes from the victim that could be used to follow her. The cops were searching for evidence of stalking, and they found that evidence, but they didn't find anything that should have raised a red flag. What is the cop supposed to do with this evidence? How does this information help 2d92ce491b
