Technical Field The present invention relates to a color conversion apparatus and an image processing apparatus. 2. Related Art In recent years, a device that realizes a high-quality image in various output devices by converting a color of an original image has been proposed. For example, JP-A-2011-231191 discloses an image processing apparatus that changes a color of an original image to a color the same as that of an output device and outputs the original image. According to this image processing apparatus, the number of input devices can be reduced. In this image processing apparatus, a color conversion table (white-balance table) is preliminarily held to convert the color of an input image in an RGB color space to a color in a CMY color space. Then, a color image read by a color image reading device is converted to a color in the CMY color space using the color conversion table. Thus, the color of the read image is matched with the color of the output device. The image processing apparatus described in JP-A-2011-231191 can deal with any kind of image without making the color conversion table complicated. However, when the image processing apparatus performs color conversion on an image with a color that is specific to the output device, the image with the specific color that is output to the output device cannot be accurately converted to the color of the output device. This may result in the image not being output to the output device. The image processing apparatus described in JP-A-2011-231191 performs color conversion on a read image that is read from an input device. Accordingly, when color conversion is performed on a read image, the color of the read image is converted to a color similar to the color of the input device. Thus, the image in the read image with a color that is specific to the output device is likely to be converted to the color of the output device. If color conversion is not performed on the read image read by the color image reading device, the color of the read image is converted to the color in the CMY color space by using a color conversion table different from that used to convert the image to the color in the CMY color space. Accordingly, the image in the read image with a color that
