Acute heart failure (AHF) is a common cause of presentation to the emergency department. A frequent finding in the clinical setting is the presence of atrial fibrillation (AF). However, the significance of AF in AHF and in particular in patients with an echocardiographic left ventricular ejection fraction (LVEF) less than 30% has not been established. The aim of this study was to characterize the electrocardiographic (ECG) changes in the acute stage of systolic heart failure (SHF), in patients with LVEF less than 30%, and to determine how well their ECG pattern correlated with left ventricular size, LVEF and pulmonary capillary wedge pressure (PCWP). The study population consisted of 107 patients with AHF (69 men, 38 women; mean age of 66 years) with LVEF less than 30% and in sinus rhythm. ECGs were obtained on admission and 12-24 h after admission. There were no significant differences in gender distribution, prevalence of AF, percentage of patients on anticoagulation or PCWP between patients with AF and those without AF. The patients with AF had lower LVEF (24 +/- 10 vs. 27 +/- 10%; p = 0.003) and a higher PCWP (28 +/- 12 vs. 19 +/- 9 mmHg; p Q. Омтба ораор 82158339de
