How To Save A Dying Relationship By Fixing The Present Moment On why this subject is considered the greatest gift, and what it really means: WHEN I was going through my four-month relationship crisis, I had no idea that I was about to discover something that is so simple yet so powerful—the ability to save a dying relationship by simply fixing the present moment. People always ask me if my breakup and divorce was painful, and the answer is no, it wasn't painful—it was agony, pure and simple. That is because I never once thought of fixing my relationships at the present moment. When I first started to study the Law of Attraction, I always seemed to get the bad boys. You know, the ones who were 20 pounds overweight, had 10-inch front hair, smoked 20 cigarettes a day, and slept until 11:30 a.m. I was drawn to these guys because they seemed to embody the same stuff that I was trying to work on: overweight, addiction, lack of self-confidence, lack of self-esteem, lack of gratitude, fear of success, and a slew of other things that I was working on. But it wasn't until I learned about the Law of Attraction that I began to understand that when I was really working on my relationships, I was not fixing what was happening at the present moment. The Problem With Fixing The Past When I was dating this guy who was so controlling, I would spend hours and hours every night trying to make my relationship work by blaming my feelings on the past. I would always say things like, “When he did that, I felt this. When he did that, I felt that.” I'd blame the past as a way of being in the present moment and getting myself to feel what I wanted to feel. What was the point of this? The past had already happened, and all it did was tell me what I didn't want. And even if I did try to live in the past and create a scenario in my head of how I wanted things to be, in reality, it would never be the same as the way it was in the past.

When I first started to learn about the Law of Attraction, I felt like, “Oh my 1d6a3396d6
