In addition to this, if the user also prints and saves the file to disk (to avoid downloading the file to the user's system), then the document can be saved to disk as a document file (a.docx file) in the same way that it is saved to disk when the user prints to a USB printer. You will still have a document to work with in the native application. If you use the native print and save function, the document is converted to a PDF file when saved to disk. If you are using a non-native application (such as Excel or Microsoft Word), there is no way to access the document in the native application and save the document to disk without ### converting it to a PDF file. Code Example - Use PrintDocument Class In my case, I am using the Windows Forms classes. If you have other print system, you can use other class instead. // import Windows.Forms.Printing

namespace

WindowsFormsPrinting.PrintDoc //{ // public class

DocumentPrintForm :

PrintDocument // { // /// // ///

Print the document to the printer specified by the supplied document. // /// /// The document to print. // public void Print(Document document) // { // Print(); // } // } // } public partial class Form1 : Form { private void printButton_Click(object sender, EventArgs e) { // Create a new DocumentPrintForm object. DocumentPrintForm documentForm = new DocumentPrintForm(); // Invoke the method Print of the DocumentPrintForm object.

documentForm.Print(document);
} Alternative,
