Game ready. .Q: Difference between Class.newInstance() and Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance() I am trying to understand the difference between Class.newInstance() and Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance() if any? Also, is one more preferred over the other? A: Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance() is a method of Class. Class.newInstance() is a method of the ClassLoader API. The ClassLoader API is designed to be used by the Java runtime, whereas the Class API is designed to be used by the Java language and runtime. Class.newInstance() Returns a newly created object with the same class and protection domain as this object. A new instance of class className is created and initialized to hold the value of the new expression. The specified constructor is invoked, passing it the argument values. Class.forName(ClassLoader.getSystemClassLoader().getResource("path")).newInstance() Returns a newly created object with the same class as className. The specified constructor is invoked, passing it the argument values. While the Class.newInstance() method is the most appropriate for invoking constructors in the Java language, some constructors of the Java language and the Java runtime cannot be invoked with this method. The ClassLoader API is designed to allow any constructed object to refer to another object in another class loader than its own. So the ClassLoader API is ideal for selecting objects of other class loaders, not for constructing new objects. A: It is not possible to invoke default constructors in the Java language. So although you may be able to invoke one from Class.forName() (which is just a convenience method), it is not guaranteed to be the same as invoking one from Class.newInstance().
