There is a compelling argument that the most important thing the federal government could do to create better policy would be to get out of the way of experimentation, both in the private and public sectors. The example of HHS is both timely and compelling. There are lessons to learn from the fact that the president has a true bipartisan team of advisers and that, in fact, the work is being done on health care policy by both Democratic and Republican staff in a true policy shop, the Office of Health Reform. The role of the public media in being a watchdog over government policy is also very important. In a better, more compassionate system, the costs of care would be lower. The country is ready for this type of leadership. Third, there is more work that needs to be done in defining what "good care" should be, what "good health" should be, and how the public media can communicate this to the American people. Fourth, there are significant political limitations that need to be recognized in the current political system. Fifth, there are new policy problems that need to
