We investigated the technical feasibility of 3-dimensional (3D) time-of-flight (TOF) multislice PCMR angiography in the evaluation of fetal vascular pathology. Forty-two 3D TOF PCMR angiographies were acquired in 10 human fetuses (gestational age, 21 weeks) with suspected abnormalities of fetal vasculature. The imaging protocol included a matrix of 256 x 256 and a slice thickness of 4 mm. 2D-TOF imaging was performed in an axial plane, and 3D TOF imaging was performed in a coronal and sagittal plane. In the other 2 planes, volume rendering was performed to obtain a 3D depiction of the fetal vascular system. Two experienced investigators, blinded to the clinical information, independently assessed the acquired 3D datasets and reports. Each investigator marked the congenital cardiovascular malformations and performed a subjective description of the anatomical anomalies. We were able to visualize the fetal vasculature in all 42 cases. No postprocessing was necessary. The 3D TOF volume rendering images, in particular, were more detailed than the 2D-TOF images. The sensitivity of the 2D-TOF imaging to detect fetal abnormalities was 44%. The sensitivity of the 3D TOF volume rendering imaging to detect fetal abnormalities was 94%. Volume rendering was a good alternative to 2D-TOF imaging for the detailed analysis of the fetal cardiovascular system. - 1 1 8 9 8 .
