I was recently offered a spot on an international course which is done over the course of about 2 years. It's an industry recognized course and the pay is excellent, but I'm afraid I don't really need to take it. I want to finish school as soon as possible. A 2-year on-the-job training program is far more expensive and does not offer the same degree of education. I'm fine with taking it, however, because I know my employer will also pay for the course. Does it really matter if I do this course as opposed to doing the practical training? Or does it just depend on the subject? Thanks for any insight. A: The main reason to take on-the-job training is to learn the craft of the trade. It's not a job in itself. You are paying to learn a new skill, and the experience is invaluable. If you can already do this skill you can teach it to someone else, so it's never 'on the job'. I recommend going for it - the people you're learning from will see you're the type of person who gets things done and it'll be useful for your CV. But if you don't think you'll like the subject, then I'd advise against it. It's a good experience, and I've taken part in a few. The feeling of learning things and the sense of achievement you'll feel when you've got the qualification are priceless. A: Just curious. How much school have you had to date? Have you taken any courses that you could have gained hands on experience with (e.g. in lieu of a degree that didn't include hands on experience). I ask this because it really depends on the learning environment you're going to be in. If you are going to a university setting where you're going to be taught by other people who are generally more experienced in the area, then it's obviously important to get your hands on as much experience as you can. But if
