The author of this type of malware is often well-equipped with the knowledge of how to make the software functions better, and this also includes the programming language used. The authors of this malware also have an ability to make the software more harmful as well as write a backdoor to make the malware propagate at the same time. The backdoors are embedded into the software itself. This is done by altering the source code of an application with some specific code. How does it work? Medical Malware is a type of malware that targets medical equipment to get access to the patient data. The malware is sometimes disguised as a free software program, but it is not genuine and is actually a cyber-criminal's tool. This type of malware may be written in different programming languages, such as Java, C++, and Visual Basic. In some cases, this may add some fake applications to the system's applications list. Most of the time, the application becomes recognized by the system as just another application. Most of the time, the malware would often be used to change specific settings on the system. Therefore, it is also used to add or remove certain items on the system's memory, such as add some items to the user's authorized applications list. By stealth, it is also able to change the application's security settings and checks. It could be used to steal the patient data, which is stored in the system's memory. The data would then be easily retrieved and used for illegal activities. Medical Malware Under Control Medical Mal
