Forecasting lower back pain in a cohort of Australian registered nurses: An observational study. The prevalence and incidence of lower back pain (LBP) are high among nurses. The prediction of a health outcome such as LBP enables identification of those at risk of LBP. This study aims to develop models to predict LBP in the cohort of Registered Nurses in New South Wales (NSW) in the first 12 months of employment. Working nurses (n=1000) included in a cohort study on New RNs in NSW, were recruited between 2008-2013. Three monthly calls were made via a dedicated website where nurses responded to the question "In the last 3 months have you had any lower back problem, e.g. stiffness, soreness, injury or other?" Logistic regression analysis was used to identify risk factors of future LBP in the cohort. The overall 12 month prevalence of LBP in the cohort of 1288 was 41%. Midwives had the lowest prevalence of LBP (35%). Nurses in the lowest 30% for hours worked per week had the highest prevalence of LBP (43%). The prevalence of LBP was high in the first 12 months of nursing employment. Building understanding of risk factors for this population is essential to inform LBP prevention.

Homepage: 17. CT100 Web Browser From CNet News: CT100 Web Browser may be a great alternative to current browsers, but it needs some work. The browser is easy to use, but it is filled with flaws. One of its primary issues is that it can take a long time to load web pages. While the Web Browser has some great features, it is so filled with design flaws and problems that serious users will probably not want to put up with its quirks any longer. This browser is specially made for Windows Mobile devices that run Windows Mobile 6.1. Features:

- Small size
- Responsive to touch operations
- HTML5 support
- Capable of caching the latest data
- Capable of caching text data
- Capable of forming search queries using touch gestures
- Capable of connecting to secured networks without security exceptions
- Capable of managing cookies
- Capable of saving passwords
- Capable of sending URL to other devices
- Capable of translating text
