PSFSQLiteManager 0.1.2 has been released, which has been in the making ever since July 2017. According to the developer, this will allow PSFSQLiteManager to work as a SQLite manager that will be based on PSFSQLite for better performance. Further, the application will allow one to work with SQLite files stored in folders, help develop functionality by connecting to both table and view SQLite tables, and preview database content. What's more, there are ready-to-use templates for data files and SQLite files, as well as the option to build one's own database or tables. In order to accomplish this task, users need to install PSFSQLiteManager, and then provide a folder with the relevant files and folders. There is also a Python module that has been integrated, with which users are able to create their own SQLite databases. It is recommended to use user-friendly navigation tools in order to access the database's folders or tables, with the possibility to delete or rename them. For more details, take a look here. PSFSQLiteManager 0.1.2 Key Features: This update is available for users running Windows 7 and Mac OS X v10.9. Users of both mobile and PC platforms are notified that Ultimate Flash Builder is going to be terminated, with a new release of Flash Builder being set to take its place. What's more, this is a step further in Google's attempt to improve mobile-first and HTML5-first projects through the development of other key tools. According to the official press release, developers will be able to download the software for free, and won't face any charges in doing so. Besides being supported for x64-based Windows 8.1 and Windows 10, this will allow Flash Builder to work on ARM-based devices as well, as well as x86-based and macOS-based systems. Among the key features, Flash Builder EDU Edition will be enhanced to provide tools for agile development, and to further assist in the development of create-to-learn applications for Android and iOS platforms. Moreover, Flash Builder Mobile Edition will allow one to manage the projects for mobile apps and also create and manage apps for Android and iOS devices. When signing up, users can create a new account for free, allowing them to access the app through any of the platforms it will be available for. 6a5afdab4c
