Yes, children and young people may be having more self-harm and even suicide than 10 years ago. Nevertheless, things are getting better. More young people are learning to manage their feelings and thoughts better. But we should all work harder to continue this trend. Yes, self-harming and suiciding are becoming all-too-common, and not just in some places. Not that they are always avoidable. But there is a growing consensus now that they are something all young people can learn to deal with. Thoughts of suicide are increasingly common among teenagers today. Various agencies agree that we are witnessing the emergence of a new phenomenon. Thoughts of suicide: not a modern problem Most research indicates that reports of suicide attempts and self-harming among young people are growing steadily. We still underestimate the prevalence of suicide and self-harming in people under 25, and particularly underestimate the level of attempted suicide and other forms of self-harming. For instance, just under half of all suicide and self-harming cases among young people involved only one attempt. This figure, however, is meaningless in view of the extreme risks to their own lives. A recent study found that over 50 per cent of all people aged under 25 had made at least one suicide attempt. We believe that these figures underestimate the true prevalence of self-harming and suicidality among young people. The New Zealand Youth Survey found that one in three young people made suicide attempts. The figure was, at that time, the highest among any age group in New Zealand. The suicide rate for 15-19 year olds is now the highest of any age group

A statistical case study is performed to understand the Phosphorous (P) cycle in a tritium (H) rich spring and wetlands water bodies at a depth of 5.3 m. The major objective is to understand the role of Phosphorous (P) in driving the P-H-R activity and the geochemical behavior of water samples from various depths of the studied springs, and wetlands. BioProfiling is performed to understand the Phosphorous cycle as it is generally difficult to estimate the total P load in the springs and wetlands directly by measuring the P chemical composition in water samples because a large fraction of the dissolved P in the water bodies consists of non-available P in the form of dissolved organic P (DOP). The statistical approach is used to detect the changes in the geometric mean (GM) and the median of the P concentration in the spring/wetlands samples, and the previously reported median and standard deviation are used to find the significance levels. It is observed that the Phosphorous cycle analysis successfully indicates different Phosphorous sources at the surface of the springs and wetlands water bodies. The SPRING group, which is characterized by their very high level of dissolved H, has a higher range of P concentration of the SPRING samples than the WETLN group. The median P concentration (x2.91) in the SPRING (0.375+/-0.1615 mM) is higher than the WETLN samples (0.243+/-0.1305 mM) with their medians (x2.00 and x1.09e8f5149f
