Conclusions {#Sec8} ===== The current work demonstrates that cancer is a major public health burden in developed countries like Australia. By showing a high prevalence of cancer types and high incidence of mortality in the Australian population, the study provides a baseline in the Australian context that will be useful for tracking trends in incidence and mortality across the country and for benchmarking against other developed countries. The results indicate that future health care services in Australia should be based on cancer prevention and not just on cancer treatment. There is also an urgent need for strengthening of epidemiological tools to accurately assess the burden of cancer in the Australian population. We suggest that future studies should include a wider array of prevalence, incidence, and mortality data on common and less common cancers. This will assist in planning and allocation of scarce health care resources to prioritise prevention and early diagnosis. Furthermore, studies on the effectiveness of primary and secondary prevention of cancer are urgently needed to reduce the incidence and mortality rates of cancer in the Australian population.
