I know that you can use "to be in" for this, but my professor said the best expression was "to spend". A: You can use the verb "to reside" if it is of the defined meaning in any dictionary. (Oxford Learners): to live in a particular place, city, or country or, to be in a location (Oxford Dictionaries) to live in a place or stay in a place But the expression

"to stay" means to remain or to dwell there for a period of time. A: The expression you've given is to be in a new place. You should be aware that in common language usage, you use to in "place" sentences to say that "you are in a place", "you are in London", etc. So, while that is acceptable, it's not usually very formal. For example, a newspaper headline might use "arrives in London" (or "arrives in NY", "arrives in SFO" etc.). Instead, what you're probably looking for is to dwell in a place. Oxford Learners offers the following example sentence, which is actually a little bit ambiguous because it could be read as "was this place one he could dwell in for a long time
