How to extract subtitles from video for free using Subtitles Extractor For a long time, the only way to incorporate subtitles into your videos was to use the video editing software. This is because most video editors don't have the option to add subtitles as a layer. However, if you download and install Subtitles Extractor, you can easily extract and add subtitles to your videos for free. This video tutorial will show you how. Let's first see what this app can do. First off, it's free to download and use, so you can play around with it to see what it can do for you. Then you can purchase a pro version to unlock more advanced features. It's priced at $4.99 and allows you to do more with your videos, but keep in mind that you will lose the video editor features if you upgrade. No installation is required to extract subtitles from video using this application. It requires some new terminology to be understood. However, it's pretty simple to use after you do. First up, you need to prepare your media file. You can find it on YouTube, Vimeo, Dailymotion, or just about any other video hosting platform. These are common apps and formats that most online video services can produce. Inside Subtitles Extractor, you need to find the relevant video. This is the one which contains the subtitles for the ones you want to use. Once you have identified this, click on it and choose “Options.” Then, you need to change the input source to “Subtitle” and “Subtitles/SD.” You will need to use the VTT file format for this. This is a text file which is uploaded by the video editing app. When it loads, you have the option to choose from a wide range of languages and settings. These include the font and color scheme to use in the subtitles. After you have your subtitles prepared, it’s time to start exporting. Click on the “Export Subtitles”
