Although optimal group size is debated, the stable group size of captive chimpanzees (Pan troglodytes) is considered to be more than two adult males. Several studies have shown that group size is related to stable social hierarchy and group dynamics, such as dominance rank and submissive behavior. But almost all studies on captive chimpanzees have involved low-ranking adults; thus, the relationship between group size and social status has not been fully investigated. Therefore, we examined the influence of group size on avoidance behavior in adult chimpanzees. To do this, we tested group size by varying the number of adult males in three captive groups. Although contact avoidance was higher when group size was less than two, the contact avoidance of the two largest groups was not different from that of the two smallest groups. In addition, a multiple regression analysis of avoidance behavior with the three independent variables of age of the female, male, and test group in which the adult male was tested, revealed no significant variables in contact avoidance.
