A: Quick Answer The line between a windshield's snow and ice modes is driven by the windshield's coating. When the coating is the same color as ice, the lines change at an interval of approximately 20 minutes. If the coating is the same color as snow, the lines reverse direction, going back and forth faster than the 10-minute interval. Keep Learning Some windshield wipers have a stainless steel plate attached to the motor. This plate is designed to remove ice. The plate has a series of magnets on its top edge. If the plate is adjusted and positioned to line up with the line between the ice and snow, the magnets will affect the coating on the window. When a windshield is coated with snow, the magnets will attract the coating and pull it away, causing the snow to become a dark color

 Category:Computer hacking in the United States Category:Privilege softwareHijacked aircraft are frequently used by terrorists or other criminals to spread infection across areas of large cities and other countries. The perpetrators may send an infected substance through the mail, or they may hide their infected substance in other luggage or clothing. Once an infected substance arrives in a mailroom or a ticket checkpoint, however, it is extremely difficult to prevent the substance from spreading undetected to other people. Airlines have increasingly been the target of terrorist attacks using hijacked aircraft in order to spread a virus or a microorganism. For example, there are multiple reports of exploding on board airplanes over the past several years. There are various ways that a virus or other microorganism can spread. A common way for a virus to spread from one person to another is to touch and/or inhale some of the persons' bodily fluids, and then to touch his or her mouth or nose. In this way, a person may inadvertently ingest the virus or other microorganism from an infected passenger when he or she touches his or her mouth and/or nose. Once ingested, the virus can enter the body through the digestive or respiratory systems. Accordingly, there is a need for a system and method for detecting the possibility that an airborne microorganism or virus is spreading within a passenger compartment of an aircraft. The present invention relates to a vacuum cleaner, in particular a domestic vacuum cleaner. Vacuum cleaners which are used for cleaning ceilings and walls are known. The vacuum cleaner is equipped with a suction head which has a brush located on its underside. In the case of the known vacuum cleaners, the suction head is supported by a handlebar in such a way that it can be pulled along in the direction of the floor and, in this way, be moved over the floor so that the brush can be moved over it. It has emerged that, on the one hand, such conventional vacuum cleaners have the drawback that the brush frequently picks up dirt lying on the ceiling or wall, which is consequently removed with the dirt from the floor. On the other hand, the suction head which is used for this purpose is relatively expensive and is difficult to maintain.
