"We're using player data from our players in real matches to bring to life interactive character options in FIFA," said David Rutter, FIFA Studio Manager at EA Canada. "We want to use the technology to bring out the best character moves in FIFA, not just simple animation." The technology goes further than the starting point of the current player models and enables more detailed animations. This includes extra dynamics where the player dynamics can include different movements for different actions, such as sprinting for a forward pass or wheeling the ball out of play, or a knee bend on a shot. “This is a technology that is already available in the game, but we have enhanced the functionality of it. We have the player data from 22 footballers and they are very detailed,” said Rutter. “We want to take the technology in FIFA and bring more detail in the movement of the players on and off the pitch and as the ball moves around the pitch.” The on-field animation technology brings more identity to the player’s moves on the pitch, and moving the players around the pitch when they are in motion using the new “HyperMotion Technology” offers a more realistic experience. “When a player is running or moving as part of a play, we can bring them to life by using the data collected from our 22 footballers and they are more organic because of the technology that we are using and the details of the players that are in the game,” said Rutter. “There are so many levels to what we can do, especially in the more dynamic moments like a shot or a pass where we are looking to create a more vibrant playing experience,” said Rutter. “The technology is allowing us to make the game more authentic and more dynamic while players are running and taking shots.” HyperMotion technology has the look and feel of the current models but it uses the new physics engine. Rutter described the integration as “a natural progression of the technology that we are using” and said that “we can’t just go back to the old engine, we have to introduce new technology to give you a look that is more realistic.” He added that the new engine “takes advantage of the integration of the physics that we have in the game for players and also for the ball. It gives us a more
