Security Council unanimously imposed more sanctions on North Korea on Wednesday, blacklisting four individuals and five entities accused of human rights abuses related to North Korea's overseas activities, which is aimed at cutting off sources of revenue for Pyongyang's ballistic missile program. Friday's Security Council meeting was China's first at the head of the 15-member body since Washington and Pyongyang launched an unprecedented nuclear summit in Hanoi last month, undermining the work of global powers to rein in North Korea's weapons ambitions. China had hoped to find a diplomatic resolution to an impasse over North Korea, but Washington and Pyongyang failed to agree on a framework for nuclear disarmament, leaving the council deadlocked and parading their differences in public. Gov. Andrew Cuomo has big plans to end homelessness. He wants it to be a distant memory by the time he leaves office in two years. That means he will have to eventually tackle the thousands of families who struggle with rent and food every day. Until then, his approach is to cut spending and increase fines to pay for homelessness services. Some critics call his plan a tax hike on the poor — and they have a point. At the same time, Cuomo's critics also argue that Cuomo is failing the homeless population by not doing more for them, and that his plan will make the problem worse. Here's what we know. What is the Cuomo plan? At a news conference unveiling the plan on March 2, Cuomo stated that he will spend $27.5 million over two years "to hire a thousand more mental health workers, expand the capacity of existing psychiatric hospitals, and provide more evidence-based treatment for individuals with co-occurring mental health and substance abuse disorders." But he acknowledged there was a need for more social services. "The state has spent $25 million to date on supportive housing programs, yet in the past two years, the number of people, including children, experiencing homelessness has risen by about 50 percent," he said. "New York City alone has spent $950 million to date on supportive housing, and has seen a 26 percent increase in the homeless population." Cuomo's plan has three parts. In the first, called "Spot the Street," the government will "collaborate with nonprofit agencies that provide services for people experiencing homelessness and people with housing insecurity to identify new programs to prevent families from becoming homeless and to address homelessness when it does occur." This will be implemented in three ways, Cuomo said: Providing the funding that agencies need to offer needed services, "including establishing a full-time social worker position to be located in every family or children's shelter to help families, and providing funding to underwrite a highly skilled and reliable vetting system for families to get into housing," to prevent families from becoming homeless. Increasing criminal penalties for causing homelessness, including "mandatory diversion" of those who commit misdemeanors, such as loitering or trespassing, "for assessment and treatment," and then prohibiting them from committing the same
