today with Samsung CEO Choi Gee-sung. He announced that Samsung's new MicroLED TV is heading to the final stages of mass production and will likely be unveiled at CES next month. His announcement was made at a Samsung event at the company's NY headquarters, and he said the South Korean giant is planning to unveil its MicroLED TV at the CES expo next month. According to the event's liveblog, Choi announced that his company would be "introducing next-generation TV technologies, including MicroLED next year," and that "stamping the MicroLED TV will take about a year." Samsung's MicroLED TV is based on the company's new-to-Samsung ultra-high-resolution AMOLED panel, with significantly smaller pixels. So far, only Samsung has announced MicroLED TVs, with rival LG — which has previously talked about MicroLED as the future of its TVs — and others hinting at their own MicroLED efforts. MicroLED displays are expected to use very little power and be far more energy-efficient than OLED, as well as be far brighter than LED. The MicroLED TV announced today is the first of Samsung's MicroLED efforts, and the company apparently plans to use its new AMOLED panel for a number of applications, including smartphones, tablets, and "other consumer products." In the meantime, Samsung plans to develop a MicroLED TV for home use that would take advantage of this new technology. The company's MicroLED TVs don't sound the same level of out-of-the-box exciting as the company's new Galaxy S10 or Galaxy Fold smartphones. That's a bit of a disappointment. Samsung should have pushed its Super AMOLED and MicroLED displays with the foldable and smartphone sales that it did. Still, these are exciting times in the TV sector, and I imagine we'll learn more about the company's plans for MicroLED later this year. b7e8fdf5c8

Formation of a second antigen receptor gene in developing B lymphocytes. B cells exhibit a tremendous polymorphism in the surface Ig-encoding gene. This polymorphism arises as a result of recombination between discrete sets of Ig gene segments. B cells also exhibit a second form of Ig variable region gene polymorphism; polymorphisms that arise by the conversion of primary Ig V gene transcripts to secondary V gene transcripts. In this report we show that secondary variable region gene transcripts are generated in developing mouse B cells by splicing during the conversion of primary transcripts. Splicing is a process in which introns are eliminated. Unlike the splicing that occurs between functional Ig genes, the splicing that occurs between primary and secondary Ig transcripts is regulated. We present evidence that initiation of splicing is regulated by interaction of germline transcripts with the transcriptional machinery. These results are the first demonstration that second Ig variable region gene formation can occur in the absence of the influence of a second Ig gene. (Reuters) - The head of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) on Monday criticized the way some companies engage in "negative and misleading short-selling" of public companies and said it was a violation of the federal securities law. REUTERS/Yuri Gripas "After the SEC issued its short-selling proposal, we learned that companies have used a variety of strategies to obstruct or even subvert compliance with the proposal, including by manipulating the integrity of the market," SEC Chairman Jay Clayton said in a speech to the Boston Institute for Nonprofit Multi-Service Organizations. Clayton was referring to proposals contained in the so-called Short-Sale Proposal that the SEC issued
