However, the number of control patients with SLE in these trials is small. In our study of a cohort of patients with established coronary artery disease, a significant association was found between CKD and the presence of CKD and clinical outcomes after coronary revascularization. However, the association between CKD and post-operative myocardial infarction was not significant. These findings, in combination with the known association between CKD and adverse events from vascular surgery, suggest that CKD is an independent risk factor for adverse events after coronary revascularization. Further studies are warranted to determine if the association between CKD and adverse events after coronary revascularization is of consequence in other clinical settings. This study did not address the impact of mineral metabolism. Our findings indicate that we should be vigilant in treating CKD in patients with established coronary artery disease. Future studies should investigate which drugs and dialysis modalities can be used to ameliorate the poor clinical outcomes associated with CKD.
