2. Description of
the Related Art
Various content
delivery systems
are used for
transmitting
digital content in a digital format from a content provider. One example of such content delivery systems are set forth in the Open Service Framework (OSF) Developer Group Version 0.15

(Aug. 27, 2003)
entitled Content Management and Service
Framework
(CMSF) Version
0.15, which is incorporated by reference in its entirety. The content delivery

systems
described in this document provide a framework and
service interface
for building
services that can deliver content.
Any OSF-

compliant content management system can be used as a CMS to provide and use the services. The CMSF is a set of specifications and APIs that define a common set of services (services), and

one or more
interfaces (APIs)
for accessing services. These services are provided as a collection of
generic content

management
be used by anything that implements the CMSF contract.
The CMSF service
interface is an abstraction that isolates an application from the underlying services and is used by a content management system to provide and use services. These services may be the basic services, such as

file, folder, image,
document,
audiovisual
object, service, or multimedia object
management.
The delivery service is a modular service
that defines basic provisioning capabilities and includes the ability to provision one or more services, such as audio-visual broadcasts, files, folders, or files. It also defines capability to retrieve and play content on a user device. The delivery service is a high-level service that is organized around pieces of content and how they are related to one another. Thus, it defines a content model, and the mechanisms to store, retrieve, and play such content. It may also include a content router that defines the

how the content is served to a
user's client
