The shortening of the inactivation time of metmyoglobin by addition of phenylalanine. The rate of the inactivation of metmyoglobin by phenylalanine is shorter in the presence of phenylalanine than in its absence, while the rate of the formation of myoglobin from the metmyoglobin-phenylalanine complex is slower in the presence of phenylalanine than in its absence. The rate of the reaction of the inactivated metmyoglobin with O₂ is much slower than that of the myoglobin. This fact is consistent with the experimental results obtained by using visible light for inactivation.

Q: Recursively copying files with right level of directory traversal I want to write a script that recursively copies a directory. And each of the copied files should be preserved with the directory it is copied in. Like this: Original directory path: /directory /a /b /c /d Script result: /directory /a /b /c /d Here is what I have so far:
