Project Summary: MicroRNAs (miRNAs) are non-coding RNAs that are critical mediators of gene expression in cells, but their mechanisms of action and regulation have only recently begun to be understood. miRNAs function within a complex network of regulatory interactions. The long-term goal of this project is to understand how these interactions occur in cells. The focus of the work in this proposal is on miRNA biogenesis. During the preparation of this grant, the following three discoveries were made: 1) A novel nuclear protein (CDR1) has been identified that is required for processing of the miRNA precursor into a stable duplex. 2) This same protein is required for all miRNAs from the miR-17-92 polycistron, but not for the other members of this polycistron. 3) The miR-17-92 polycistron can be repressed by a specific miRNA and not by other miRNAs in the polycistron (which include the two known growth-regulatory miRNAs). These discoveries are the basis of the proposed studies. Specific Aim 1 is to define the function of CDR1 in miRNA biogenesis. Specific Aim 2 is to determine if the function of CDR1 is restricted to the miR-17-92 polycistron. Specific

Aim 3 is to identify the mechanisms of miRNA repression of the miR-17-92 polycistron. These studies will use CDR1 knockout cells, mutant miRNAs, and overexpressed wild type miRNAs. This work has relevance to the pathology of cancer and cardiovascular disease. This work will reveal new mechanisms of gene regulation involving miRNAs, revealing new biological networks that could be targeted for therapeutic purposes. Highly Polarizable Quantum Chemical Calculations of Proton Transfer Dynamics in Methanol/Water Mixtures Including Explicit Solvation and Zero-Point Energy Effects.
