The energy density per unit mass of presently existing energy storage systems such as lithium-ion batteries and supercapacitors is much lower than their theoretical limits, largely due to the high density of the anodes used in these systems. This undesirably limits the range of applications and raises the prices of the batteries and capacitors. In this work, we use a graphene anode with a micron-scale thickness of only a few nanometers to fabricate a high-performance, low-cost, ultrahigh energy density microbattery. First, the stability of the graphene anode is compared with that of carbon nanotube (CNT) anodes over a range of current densities and electrolytes. The energy densities of both graphene and CNT anodes are observed to increase with current density, and the response time and overpotential to constant current decreases with increasing current density. This reveals the significance of electric-field-enhanced reactions (such as electrochemical degradation) in graphene anodes. Next, a comparison between lithium intercalation in CNT and graphene anodes is made. The discharge capacity of the graphene microbattery is found to be approximately double that of the equivalent-sized CNT battery. Finally, the performance of the graphene microbattery is optimized using a nanoscale-thick active material and through a proper choice of the electrolyte composition. After operating for hundreds of charge-discharge cycles, the graphene microbattery retains a high discharge capacity and a high energy density in a wide operating voltage range. A consistent energy density of up to $67.0 \mu\text{Wh cm}^{-3}$ and a high power density of up to $44 \mu\text{W cm}^{-3}$ are observed in the microbattery.
