The invention relates to a method for detecting an object in an electronic camera and a camera comprising the method. An object to be detected is the term used in relation to a camera or a detector such as an ID reader. An ID reader is a device which reads an identification code written on the object to be detected. The object to be detected may be a person, a vehicle or an object, for example. The identification code is not always an ID code, but may be an object code or product code which may be completely different from an ID code. Hereafter an ID reader is used as an example to illustrate the invention. During the photographing of an object by an electronic camera it is often necessary to identify the object to be detected by a device such as an ID reader. The ID reader can verify the ID code contained in the object by reading the ID code and it can thus determine if the object has been photographed by the electronic camera correctly or not. A problem with the ID reader is that it is not always possible to determine which part of the detected object has been photographed. One alternative is to photograph the whole object, but this entails the drawback that a larger part of the detected object cannot be recognized. As a result thereof, a relatively large proportion of the detected object is often not recognized by the ID reader. Furthermore, the use of an ID reader is itself cumbersome if it is arranged to read the ID code in the course of a normal photographing sequence of the object. Another alternative is to arrange the ID reader to read the object to be detected in a special photographing sequence. By this method,
