The most significant change to the game is the introduction of a new AI system. During simulation, if a player does something that is deemed “decisive,” EA Sports will now make sure that the AI will always behave accordingly, regardless of player upgrades, previous player attributes or gameplay settings. “We’ve put a lot of technical work into it,” said Owen Barkhouse, producer of FIFA 2K18. “When you look at the screen, it’s going to be correct. It shouldn’t be ever changing. But, unfortunately, when you look at the screen, some things can change. You should never see things changing in the screen.” There are a number of other system-level changes in FIFA 22, including a new system for goalkeepers, new animation and improvements to teams like Ajax and Chelsea. FIFA 22 introduces “HyperMotion Technology.” Player development is another major addition to FIFA. It is now possible to level up different attributes and improve players’ characteristics, as well as add new skill sets by unlocking them. For example, players can unlock “Sprint” by earning enough goals in a match. In the next season, this sprint level will increase, and players will no longer need to spend cash to unlock it. “In some cases, if we didn’t make some adjustments to the sprint skill, players wouldn’t be able to make it in a particular level. If they didn’t make the sprint skill do something, then the player wouldn’t be able to sprint anymore,” Barkhouse explained. “We’ve made the sprint [level] act like a skill, so if you put enough money in your account, the sprint level will go up, and if you haven't spent any money, the sprint level will remain the same. If you pay more money, the sprint level will go up. This gives more of a fantasy feel." New animations are also present in the game. You can now see each player's reaction to a particular action. For instance, you can see how certain players react when they see a long ball lobbed over the top of them or when they get the ball and need to take a shot. "We've made sure that our animations are accurate. For example, if a player does an action
