TNF-related apoptosis-inducing ligand (TRAIL) is a member of the TNF superfamily that selectively induces apoptosis in malignant cells and therefore is considered to be an ideal candidate for cancer therapy. Its promise for skin cancer therapy has been proven by multiple in vivo experiments. However, the mechanism of action of TRAIL in skin tissue is still not well understood. Therefore, we analyzed the phenotype, the localization and the function of TRAIL in human skin. RT-PCR analysis revealed that TRAIL is abundantly expressed in the outer root sheath of the hair follicle as well as in the epidermis of human skin. Immunohistochemical analysis showed a differential distribution pattern in the tissue: TRAIL was predominantly expressed in the upper and lower parts of the hair
