Q: Why do we have to get the clutch in when changing the oil We have a 2005 Mazda 6, manual transmission. Recently I had the oil changed and noticed that it was fine and then an hour later we had to get the clutch in because it was slipping. I am not sure whether it was due to being new or not. Thanks for any help you can offer. A: There is no real reason for the clutch to need replacing unless you're having engine problems and if it's not needing new shoes or the clutch bearings or any other wear items. You can also have it checked at a local garage, but to be sure I'd suggest changing to a reputable dealer in a large city that has a lot of Mazda cars. The dealer should have someone at the desk who knows about your car and can tell you what to watch out for. A: This is an engine-related question that only belongs on the Mazda-owners site, not here on Mechanics SE, but from what you've described, that is a common problem that Mazda mechanics deal with. It sounds like your clutch (the master cylinder) is leaking at the slave cylinder (the clutch actuating plate). As such, it would be normal to have to get it repacked. It may also be the master cylinder itself that needs replacing. Those are two common points of failure. A: I know this is an old question, but I'm asking for a bit of a different answer. I'm fairly new to driving the Mazda 6, having recently purchased one for my first used car, and I'm in the same situation as yourself. Last week, one of my husband's coworkers drove his Mazda 6 and had the same problem. He said he had to replace the clutch just a week before we bought the car. Although I'm new to the car, I have had my car checked by a dealer,
