A: You're using a technology called HTTP/HTML hyperlink (HTML hyperlink) links to other file, such as images, audio and text files, using a hypertext transfer protocol (http). which is different from a links (or hyperlink) to a file (or folder). The former requires that the recipient have an account on the same site. The latter does not. From Mozilla's documentation: If the browser does not recognize the protocol scheme of a resource, and the user does not have an account on the current site, the browser does not display the resource, as would be the case if the browser fetched the document from a different site. The Browser is not treated as requesting a resource as specified by the link. The protocol scheme must exactly match the scheme of the link's href attribute. The HTTP protocol is a requirement for the resource to be served over HTTP.

That is why you get this behaviour: you are requesting a link to an offline file (.zip) and by not having an account on this site, you aren't allowed to access that link. Since you're using an asynchronous script, Javascript, the request to the remote server is not done yet when your script is executed (the login request hasn't been answered by the server). Thus, your script doesn't have to wait for the server to reply. You might want to read up on the "Synchronous"/"asynchronous" javascript vs AJAX article. Hello to all! We are Brita and Bill, a couple who live on a farm in the heart of a small town in Germany. It's a great place to raise our two kids and enjoy the outdoors. Welcome to our blog. We love our life and our family. We love being able to share it all with you. We're always looking for new ways to be crafty, find ways to live naturally, and make our daily lives more with less. The present invention relates to the filtering of components from a flow stream. In particular, the present invention relates to the filtering of components from a flow stream by screening. Traditionally, components of a flow stream which are too large to be separated by other methods such as centrifugation are separated by passing them over a screen. The screen is typically a wire mesh or metal fabric. The components which pass through the mesh are separated from the components which are caught by the fabric. In the case of filtration, the components which pass through the mesh are separated from the components which are caught by the fabric and held back in a filter bag. In the case of clarifying a thick suspension of particles, the components of the flow stream which pass through the mesh are separated from the components which are caught by the fabric and held in a hopper. The size of the screen is determined by the diameter of the mesh or the diameter of the fabric. Traditional screens have a large surface area to volume ratio and a low specific gravity. High density materials, such as feathers, or low density components, such as water, pass through the screen and a substantial amount of the total volume of a flow stream may pass through the screen without being separated. An object of the present invention is to provide a separator apparatus which reduces the amount of flow stream which passes through without being separated.Aurelius Frege Aurelius Rudolf Ludwig Frege (; ; 29 September 1848 – 27 September 1925) was a German mathematician who is best known for his work in the foundations
