Network Solutions' domain name registration services, in exchange for giving Sia and his co-conspirators priority status for the domains "digitalriver.com" and "paypal.com," which previously were available on the market for $10,000 a year. Today's lawsuit alleges that from at least December 2007 through September 2009, Sia and Long discussed how Sia could obtain priority status for the domains. The lawsuit says that Sia told Long he was interested in obtaining the priority for the domains because it would give him special access to the domains, which could be beneficial to Sia's then-significant assets in online gambling, and that it would assist him in selling the domains. In 2009, the lawsuit says, Sia demanded payments and then used his position at Network Solutions to enforce his demands, charging all of the company's customers multiple times for services he had not provided. In addition, the lawsuit alleges that Sia and Long did not truthfully disclose in Network Solutions' financial statements Sia's scheme to receive priority status for the domains. "We allege that in order to expand their businesses, Network Solutions and its CEO and executives devised a scheme to defraud customers by providing preferential registration service for domains that included the name of one of their competitors," said Lynne L. Mizel, co-director of the SEC's enforcement division. "They falsely claimed they were providing special services
