What's New * Fixes Bug which was preventing some users from downloading music via IOS and Android devices Spraying of ethanol inhibits root exudation of organic acids and phenolics in apple rootstocks. Root exudation is an important physiological process.

The effect of ethanol on the exudation of organic acids and phenolics was tested in non-inoculated apple rootstocks by foliar application. The study was conducted in an experimental field at the Department of Plant Biology, University of Helsinki, during summer and autumn 2007 and spring and autumn 2008. Ethanol was sprayed 1 week prior to the exudation study (12 weeks after application) at different concentrations (0.3, 0.6, 1.2, and 2.4%) and the response was measured by collecting the exudates using a micro-composite sampler. The responses were represented by mass of exudates per g of root dry weight. Among metabolites studied, organic acids and phenolics were released in different quantities from different apple rootstocks sprayed with ethanol. The highest increase in mass of released organic acids

Hoboken: Over the past year, the debate over whether to build a new PATH station at the intersection of Newark Avenue and Palisade Avenue has been raging in the streets of downtown Hoboken. Earlier this month, the Hoboken City Council voted 6-0 to adopt Hoboken's official City Council resolution opposing the proposed

Hudson County project, thereby blocking state funding for the transit-oriented development project. It was a surprising result considering that at the time, one council member (Bob Smith) had been lobbying Hoboken for the project. Last night (November 9), a couple hundred residents, along with Hoboken's top elected officials including Mayor Ravi Bhalla, attended a public forum at New Jersey College of Chiropractic (NJC). There, the NJ
