Halogenated solvents, namely toluene, chlorinated solvents, trichloroethane, trichloroethylene, perchloroethylene, tetrachloroethylene, trichloroethene and perchloroethene, have been determined in surface water from several reservoirs in Argentina. Concentrations of toluene, chlorinated solvents, and trichloroethylene were similar to those reported in other studies, while the other compounds were not detected. Toluene concentrations were higher than trichloroethylene concentrations, suggesting that chlorinated solvents are the major source of dissolved organic matter in these waters. The oxidation of halogenated solvents was studied by indirect measurement of dichloroacetylene, dichloroethene, 1,1,1-trichloroethane, 1,1,1-trichloroethene and trichloroacetylene in surface water samples. Generation of dichloroacetylene, dichloroethene and 1,1,1-trichloroethane from toluene, trichloroethylene and tetrachloroethylene was observed, while oxidation of trichloroethene and perchloroethene was not detected.Argentina's supreme court on Thursday upheld an order to sell off more than $US10.4 billion ($US11.4b) worth of Argentine government assets, just hours after a deadline passed by which it could have blocked the controversial order. The ruling by Argentina's top court affirmed a December 18 order by a lower court, which had been under pressure to reverse itself. The court ruling means investors are expected to lose billions of dollars as the government begins to sell off Argentine government assets, including shares in the utility YPF and the energy company Pluspetrol. The ruling comes after a controversy that has been building for months, with many investors hoping the court would block the government's efforts to restructure Argentina's debt through what the government calls "truthful
