Considering the high frequency of monosomy 7, the link with myelodysplasia-associated genetic changes (MA-MDS), and the association of 7q defects with poor outcome, we conducted a comprehensive study of AML patients who achieved CCyR after induction therapy. Consecutive patients with AML who achieved CCyR were analyzed for the presence of seven known recurrent genetic alterations and for MA-MDS. The results were compared with AML cases that failed to achieve CCyR at the time of diagnosis. Five hundred and sixty-six patients with AML were treated; among them, 60 (10.5%) achieved CCyR. The median follow-up from the time of CCyR was 36 months. Monosomy 7 at the time of diagnosis was detected in 7 of 60 CCyR and in 9 of 40 (20.9%) non-CCyR patients (P 60 years were the only independent adverse prognostic factors in terms of achieving CCyR.
