I understand that VMWare Virtual Network Adapter (VNA) is a device that allows VMWare to attach to another network and communicate with the host and to attach to a different network and communicate with another host. What I don't understand is when you connect to this adapter, does the VMWare software do the following: Tell both networks, your host and the other network, that you are using the new VNA? Initiate a tunnel between the two networks (how is this done)? I am asking because I think there are some risks that I have not mentioned and don't understand. A: When you connect a network adapter to a VM, the VM is still only assigned one NIC on the physical network device, even if it's actually using several NICs on the host. This makes it impossible for the VM to actually communicate with other network devices in the host's network, but it does allow it to have a certain degree of flexibility in being able to add and remove the VM's own NICs to the physical network. When you use the VM's network adapter, you're actually adding the VM's own NIC to the physical network; any traffic coming into the VM's NIC comes to the host first, and then is delivered to the VM. The host does not actively listen for any traffic sent out of the VM's NIC, but rather blocks all traffic unless it is addressed to the VM. Likewise, traffic going out of the VM's NIC is delivered to the host first before being sent out to the Internet. If you use the virtual adapter without a bridged network, this is all that happens. However, if you connect the virtual adapter to a bridged network, the VM's IP address and the IP addresses of all devices in the virtual network are "mapped" to a specific subnet on the physical network. All traffic (including packets sent to devices on the physical network,
