Printing server manufacturers often include an option within their products to accept for printing print jobs which have the capability to receive page-level encryption. This capability may also be referred to as a feature which permits a printer to accept documents which contain cipher text. This feature is typically referred to as a cryptography feature. A print job may be encoded before delivery to a printing device so that the print job is in a form acceptable to the particular printing device. For example, an encrypted print job may be sent to a printing device to receive print job data. The printing device receives the print job data, decodes the received print job data, and prints the document. More generally, print job data is commonly encoded before being transmitted from a computer network for eventual printing. Encryption is a common technique for securing print jobs. The possibility of transmitting an encrypted print job causes a conundrum within the printing device. The printing device should be able to decrypt a received encrypted print job, should, at the same time, not actually print the contents of the print job.

Decryption of the print job is possible only if the printing device includes a print job decryption application. This poses a problem in that print jobs, including print job data, are typically not transmitted to devices that do not include a decryption application. Thus, a printing device which does not include a print job decryption application cannot receive an encrypted print job. Accordingly, the need exists for a printing device which can receive a print job that is printed from a computer network and which can enable printing of the received print job.OTTAWA – The CBC

As per the documentation, I would expect the following command: git commit --show-signature to show me the exact signature that I am about to commit (plus the commit message and any diffs that I have added). However, it sometimes truncates the diffs, as in this case: bla bla bla --- bla bla bla And sometimes it doesn't, as in this one: bla bla bla bla bla bla Because the diffs are tall and narrow, they are sometimes being truncated in the commit. How can I get this to always show all of the diffs? A: It depends on the "editor used to create the commit." Both

Visual Studio and git de-emphasize the signature; see the "git commit --show-signature" man page: When using a visual editor, the signature block is usually truncated to avoid obscuring the text edited. A commit that has no text will show the entire signature block. Q: CSS - Sorting elements by class
