I have a dream of having dedicated performance monitor for my main system, which would collect and report different metrics regarding the performance of my system. It would collect CPU load, memory usage, disk space etc. Does it make sense to invest a lot of time and money into creating such a system when most of the time I would only use its output for visualizing and analyzing current statistics. What are the benefits of having a dedicated performance monitor apart from the obvious ones? A: I've always believed that a performance monitoring system should be a manual process that you would manually check on from time to time. You have the added overhead of installing and configuring the monitoring tool, but the CPU intensive and very time consuming process is what you really are interested in: collecting data and analyzing it. You are not looking for a system that you can just run and run, you really want something that you look at (manually) and then say "oh, well my system is a bit slow now" or "wow, my system really sucks today". The main benefit of a dedicated monitoring tool is simply that you can use it for that, but you can also use a free tool like iPerf if you don't want to
